The use of flumes would not ordinarily be encouraged, and it is believed that they can be entirely eliminated. The only points where they might be considered at all are where the Fremont Canal crosses Crow Creek and Dry Creek, and where the Wyoming Canal crosses Dry Creek. These streams are very narrow and deep, and it is believed that a reinforced concrete culvert can be thrown across the creeks at each point, and the canal carried over them without any difficulty. By making the culverts considerably greater in length than the width of the canals, heavy canal banks can be provided and a permanent and safe crossing of the stream assured. It might be more economical to carry the Fremont Canal across Crow Creek through concrete steel pipes or siphons, as they...
